NOTES ON THE PROGRAM

Violin virtuosity reached a new height around the year 1700. From the start of the Baroque Period a hundred years earlier, skilled craftsmen like Gasparo da Salò advanced string instrument building technique until it reached its apex with the instruments of Antonio Stradivari and Giuseppe Guarneri. The burgeoning music publishing industry also inspired composers to write pieces that would stand out and establish their international reputations. The new instruments and new ability to distribute music motivated and challenged composers to write technically demanding music that would have wide appeal.

Antonio Vivaldi, born in Venice in 1678, took advantage of these new trends in the music industry. He was an incredible violin virtuoso—his playing was so exhilarating and daring that a contemporary described himself as “terrified” when he heard it. He was also a prolific composer, a skilled opera impresario, and all-around musical entrepreneur. His vocal music, today mostly forgotten, was an important part of his career. He claimed to have composed 94 operas, both for his main theater, the Teatro San Angelo in Venice, and many patrons elsewhere, and he traveled extensively as an impresario after 1718. He also composed a wealth of instrumental music, including 90 sonatas and a whopping 500 concertos, nearly half for violin and the rest for an incredible variety of instruments including bassoon, cello, oboe, and flute.

When Vivaldi was starting out, the concerto form popularized by Rome-based composer Arcangelo Corelli dominated Italian instrumental music. It developed out of the trio sonata and its three solo instruments—two violins and cello—were accompanied by strings and continuo. Corelli had a lot of qualities that Vivaldi didn’t: he was well educated, a respected mentor and teacher, and a writer of virtuosic but tasteful music. Vivaldi was none of those things. He was brash, egotistical, and his playing was as fiery as his difficult personality. (“His vanity was notorious” according to biographer Michael Talbot.) Corelli’s students organized memorial concerts every year for decades after his death—Vivaldi had already been forgotten by the time he died penniless in 1741 in far-away Vienna.

The Sonata in A minor for Cello and Continuo, RV 43 was one of six published in Paris around 1739. Vivaldi probably wrote it much earlier, as manuscript evidence dates it back to at least ten years before. It wasn’t written for publication as the French edition was carried out without Vivaldi’s consent—unscrupulous practices were basically the norm in music publishing of the time and enforcement of intellectual property was nonexistent. Vivaldi’s cello sonatas aren’t like his violin works—they’re less virtuosic and in the more conservative sonata da chiesa (“church sonata”) style with four movements ordered slow-fast-slow-fast. They show a different side of the famously flashy composer, one that is composed, circumspect, refined, and elegant.

The Concerto in G minor for Flute, Oboe, and Bassoon, RV 103 is one of Vivaldi’s chamber concertos, a group of more than 20 works labeled as concertos that don’t have string ensembles accompanying the soloists. Instead, one group of instruments shares the solo and ensemble ripieno parts. Many are for mixed groups of soloists or strings—this is Vivaldi’s only chamber concerto for winds alone. This concerto is also one of just two of the chamber concertos that doesn’t have basso continuo. It isn’t known why he wrote these unusual pieces and they weren’t published in his lifetime but they were probably written in the late 1710s or 1720s.

The Concerto in F major for Three Violins, Strings, and Continuo, RV 551 (1711) was published in one of the most influential instrumental music publications of the 18th century, Vivaldi’s L’estro armonico (The Harmonic Inspiration), which set new standards in violin playing, elevating fiery virtuosity in fast movements and a singing tone in slow movements. L'estro armonico (The Harmonic Inspiration) also established Vivaldi’s preference for three contrasting movements (fast-slow-fast) and pioneered a new use of the ritornello form. The ritornello ("return") started out in vocal music as a repeated instrumental interlude between sung sections and it was just entering the realm of instrumental music when Vivaldi started composing. Vivaldi quickly elevated it to the standard form for all concerto movements. In his music, ensemble ritornello sections are tonally stable to establish the home key at the start and end of the movement and reinforce each change of key during the movement. The solo sections, in turn, are tonally unstable, modulating between keys, which amps up the tension during the daring virtuosic passages.

Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center

Vivaldi published the Sonata in D minor for Two Violins and Continuo, RV 63, "La Follia," the earliest piece on the program, just two years after getting a position as violin teacher at the Pio Ospedale della Pietà, a highly regarded girls’ orphanage with an unparalleled music program. This sonata is a one-movement set of variations on the famous tune La Follia, which was set by more than 100 composers dating back to late Renaissance Spain and Portugal. Vivaldi chose it as the final selection in his Op. 1, his first published set of compositions. The piece is a trio sonata with the two violins playing melody parts and cello and guitar sharing the accompanimental continuo part.

The Concerto in D major for Mandolin, Strings, and Continuo, RV 93 is one of three works Vivaldi originally wrote for lute for the Czech Count Wrbty while on a visit to central Europe when his operas were being performed in Vienna and Prague around 1730. The solo part is played here on a mandolin, a close relative of the lute family that is smaller and has fewer strings than the Renaissance lutes played in Vivaldi’s time and today. Vivaldi infused his characteristic vigor and virtuosity into the plucked solo part, which shines in rousing episodes in the first and third movements.

More than 100 contemporary compositions, 15 of them concertos, have been written for him, while his inspired reimaginings of music for other instruments include the arrangements heard on his 2015 ECHO Klassik Award-winning Deutsche Grammophon recording, Vivaldi. As the first mandolin soloist to become an exclusive Deutsche Grammophon artist, he has made a number of recordings for the label to date: his 2012 debut, featuring his own Bach concerto transcriptions, and, his most recent, Art of the Mandolin. Recent highlights include dates at Beijing’s National Centre for the Performing Arts, London’s Wigmore and Royal Albert Halls, the Berlin Philharmonie, Zurich’s Tonhalle, Barcelona’s Palau de la Música Catalana, the Paris Philharmonie, and, with a live telecast on Arte, the Palais de Versailles. He is also a favorite on the international festival circuit, having appeared at the Aspen, Salzburg, Tanglewood, Spoleto, Ravenna, and Verbier festivals. Born in Be’er Sheva, Israel, Mr. Avital played in the mandolin youth orchestra founded and directed by his teacher, Russian-born violinist Simcha Nathanson.
